 - A study published by the Federal Governments Renewable Energy Lab, comparing mechanical and chemical recycling, is shining a light on the problems with chemical recycling.
 - Mechanical recycling
 - Is the process used by most towns and cities that does not change the chemical makeup of plastic
 - Mechanical recycling displays better environmental and economic performances than chemical recycling technologies.
 - Chemical recycling
 - Has an intense use of heat to change plastics' chemical makeup
 - Chemical recycling processes have worse environmental and economic outcomes than the production of virgin plastics because of the minimal production of "recycled" plastics they produce compared to the input of energy and materials.

Environmental Advisory Committee Meeting Minutes
September 1, 2026

- According to the study, chemical recycling can be 10-100 times worse for the environment than virgin plastic production.
 - The study also points out that the claim that chemical recycling can infinitely recycle plastic is not true because only 1%-14% of the plastic material is recycled into new products.
